
Chapter 3 — Group 3

CODEPENDENCE & ACCEPTANCE

[Instructions: Read this chapter prior to coming to your next group. Answer the questions in the chapter before coming to group. In group, you will simply share what your answers were and participate in a brief question/answer discussion held by the group facilitator.]

Professionals consider codependency an attempt to control a relationship. But it isn't always a direct attempt at control — it's often more indirect. The example of the young woman allowing the man to smoke shows this. By allowing the man to smoke the young woman was trying to keep the man around her — she was trying to control the outcome. But she went against her basic desires in an attempt to keep him. She didn't tell him about it and she even betrayed the truth about her beliefs and desires. (He asked her if she minded. She said, "no.") If she had said something like — "normally I'd mind, but I don't care if you do" — it would have been more direct and honest. But it still would not have been totally honest.

Many codependent relationships in our lives are attempts to control an uncontrollable situation. Last chapter, we told you about a young man who was bailed out of jail by his parents. They had to put their house up for their son's large bail. The parents had struggled with their son's drug use for years. They did everything they could to help him. They got him into programs, allowed him to live at home when he wanted, got him jobs, drove him to work, loaned him money, and tried to clean up his many legal messes. Why?

When asked about it, they replied, "Because we love him. He's our son." When asked how their many efforts to help their son had actually helped him, they paused. "Well, at least he's not in prison."

When the young man was questioned, he openly resented his parents. "They want to control everything I do," he angrily said. "They've always told me what to do." He felt that living with his parents was like living in a prison. (He'd never been in a real prison.)

"So you sometimes deliberately do the exact opposite of what they want?" he was asked.

"Yes," was his simple reply.

Looking at this real-life example, it should be pretty clear that the man's parents were trying to control him. It should also be clear that they could never completely control him. He was willing to allow them to bail him out of his troubles time and again, but he still did whatever he wanted. And he even called them "stupid" for it. He showed this by jumping bail — he really didn't care if his parents lost their home because of his behavior. The parents were trying to control a situation that was uncontrollable. They never accepted the situation and gradually worsened it. In short, the man's parents never accepted the truth about their relationship with their son.

At the same time, the son was trying to control his parents. Although he resented his parents, he was completely dependent on them and they couldn't be controlled by him. This, of course, made him angry and even more resentful. But the fact is that he could not control his parents. He refused to accept the truth.

This is a good example of how lots of codependent relationships develop. Usually, both people in the relationship are trying to exert control over a person or a situation that cannot be completely controlled. Once you are aware of such a relationship, the first thing that has to be done is to have acceptance.

I. Acceptance Questions

By definition, acceptance is receiving the truth with an open mind. For example, if you have children, one of the jobs of parenting is to raise your children so that they can one day leave you and raise their own family successfully. You should accept this basic truth about children and then do what you know to be right. Fighting truth and reality is a useless activity.

Another example of acceptance is even simpler. Have you ever bought a "new" car and mistakenly thought you were going to have trouble-free driving for years to come? But the car had problem after problem. Each time it was taken back for repairs — and each time it came back "fixed." But problem after problem still occurred with it no matter how much time, work, and money you put into it. Even getting angry at the dealer or repair shop didn't keep it trouble free. (The mechanic might have said something like, "We're working on it. We're doing the best we can.") In this example, the car is probably what is referred to as a "lemon." That is, it will never let you be worry-free and it will have problem after problem because it has fundamental defects that can't really be fixed. In this situation, if you are going to keep the car despite its defects, it's best to just expect more problems. Learn to accept them. It's best to accept that it is going to cost you more money and that it will break down whenever it pleases. It is out of your control.

Relationships can be looked at like the car example above. Some relationships help us get places, the people can be fun to be with, they are reliable and don't cost us a lot. But some relationships are lemons. They cause problem after problem. We aren't telling you to dump a relationship, but we are saying that acceptance of what you can control in that relationship is important.

1. List three things you believe you control in your life. (Examples may be health, exercise, money, the house, clothing, time.)

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____

2. List three things that are very important to you, but you accept that you have very little control over.

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____

3. List three things in your life that you have been trying to control that you know can't really be controlled.

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____

II. Relationship Worries/Wants/Needs

The final exercise in this chapter requires a little thought. Answer the questions; in group you will share what you wrote. You will be asked a few additional questions about control.

All of us worry about things. And all of us have some worries and concerns about our relationships. List three things that you worry about (or are truly concerned about) in regards to the relationship that led you into this group. (Examples: "I worry that he might do more drugs"; "I'm worried she might leave me"; "I worry that he'll never get a job.")

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____

Think about the worries you wrote down above. What is it you want to happen with each worry? (Example: "I want him to quit doing drugs.")

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____

Now answer the question: Why do you want those things to happen?

1. _____
2. _____
3. _____

Let's pretend for a moment that what you want to happen — won't happen. Answer these two questions: Could you still be happy in your life? Why or why not?

1. _____ Why? _____
2. _____ Why? _____
3. _____ Why? _____

If you have filled out this chapter before group and successfully shared your responses with the group, you will be asked to move on to the next chapter.
